Social Change

This graphic illustrates the connection between the risk factors for experiencing interpersonal violence. We can participate in creating social change by working to affect these at the individual, relationship, community and broader society levels. Below are examples of how SafePlace addresses each:

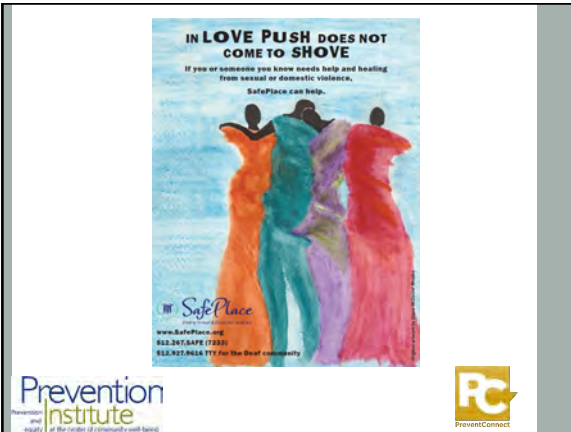

Individual	Relationship	Community	Societal
Individual attitudes & beliefs determine interpersonal violence. Risk factors include a history of abuse or witnessing violence. SafePlace's Family Center Counseling provides families the opportunity to heal & stop the cycle of violence in their families.	Relationships formed & family environments that is emotionally supportive, physically violent or rooted in controlling others. SafePlace's School-Based Services provide support groups for students experiencing domestic violence, sexual abuse or teen dating violence. This program educates young people about respectful relationships.	Community: general tolerance of sexual & domestic violence; lack of support from all community systems; lack of employment opportunities; weak community sanctions against perpetrators. SafePlace's Community Collaborations engages with a variety of agencies & organizations working to benefit people at risk of violence. Collaboration begins with networking and establishing relationships with various community systems, such as hospitals, law enforcement, government entities and other non-profits that survivors of sexual and domestic violence often need.	Societal inequalities based on gender, race, sexual orientation, religion or cultural beliefs, economic & social policies. Using guidelines SafePlace helped the Austin Independent School District develop the Governance of Texas signed HB 121 into law. This law requires every school district in Texas to adopt and implement a dating violence policy to help protect youth.
